They use bulk carriers to transport coal from mine-site to loading facilities and to export ports. As the demand for energy rises, many countries are seeking to increase their energy production by increasing their coal reserves and production. To accomplish this, the demand for coal barge operators has increased greatly. Much of the demand for coal barges is for export, where the cost of the ship is not as important as is the cargo. A bulk carrier is the most economical type of ship for transporting coal. As well as using the cargo space, bulk carriers can carry other types of cargoes that are valuable, but bulky. In Australia, barge ships are also sometimes used to carry iron ore. However, there are still disadvantages, and most of the barge ships are bulk carriers or general cargo ships, and used for coal export. Construction The bulk carriers are commonly a combination of bulk carrier and passenger or freight vessel. They are large, and are built to withstand a large amount of pressure. While they are sturdy, they are not as energy-efficient as a semi-submersible vessel. They often rely on the deep draft of the cargo to move them through the water, and therefore a significant amount of energy is required. They also often have a low amount of freeboard, meaning they are often subject to water leaking into the cargo hold. History The use of bulk carriers to transport coal is relatively new in Australia, as it is in many other countries. However, bulk carriers have been an accepted cargo since the 1960s, and are in use for a variety of commodities. In the United States, coal barges are used primarily for coal export. A large percentage of the U.S. coal export goes to foreign markets, mainly in Latin America, Asia, and the Middle East. Operations Barges are used to transport both raw and processed coal to the export countries. In Australia, the Port of Newcastle has the largest concentration of barges in the country, and most of them are used for coal export. Australia
