Despite recent advances in our understanding of the pathogenesis of spontaneous (genetic) hypertension, it remains a poorly defined subject. The advent of refined methods for recording the integrated changes in cardiac contractile and vascular parameters in freely-moving rats, and for the detailed genetic analysis of inbred strains of laboratory rats, can provide data about the kinetic and response characteristics of the brain and the cardiovascular system in the natural environment that are of considerable value in attempting to validate or refute current theories of the pathogenesis of chronic hypertension. Kinetic modeling for microalgae lipid production and discussion of process design in a CO₂ conversion system. Cultivation of microalgae is considered an alternative process for biofuel production because of their competitive advantage over terrestrial plants. However, this process must balance the energy cost required for cultivation and the feedstock's productivity to make it competitive in terms of energy production. This study focused on modeling and optimization of a cultivation system for lipid production from microalgae using CO₂ as a substrate. As a central point, lipid production rate was quantified and kinetic models were developed for it. As an initial step, the lipid production rate of Chlorella sp. was modeled and compared with that reported in the literature. Lipid production rate of Chlorella sp. was successfully modeled with mass-transfer coefficient-based kinetic equations, based on local and centerline-averaged values. As an extended study, the cells at different locations in the reactor were simultaneously tracked using two-dimensional (2D) digital imaging analysis. The results showed that significant biomass production occurs at the center of the reactor and the new scheme of biomass distribution inside the reactor was suggested for more accurate calculations of lipid production rate. Based on these results, the kinetics of lipid production of Chlorella sp. was modeled and compared with the results of the literatures. Based on these modeling results, the following conclusions were obtained: carbon dioxide diffusivity must be at least 10-fold greater than oxygen diffusivity to optimize lipid production. The oxygen concentration near the surface of the reactor greatly affects the growth of microalgae, and increasing the height of the cells near the bottom of the reactor yields higher
